M in Latin, M μ Greek, called Μῦ, either from its sound, the Greek Μυκάω and the Latin mugio being formed from hence, or rather from μύω, claudo, because it opens and shuts the lips; מ Hebrew in the beginning and middle of words; ם, or, if the vacant space in the end of a line require it, [ם]: it is perhaps called מם mem from its double form, open and shut, which is represented in writing its name; or it may be from מום a blot, which the Arabians use for its figure; 𝔐 𝔪 English and German black letter. Its sound is inarticulate, being formed by the mouth through the lips. This letter, though a liquid, suffers no mute in Latin to stand before it in the same syllable, except g, and that only in one pure classical word, viz. agmen; although among the Greeks, who perhaps gave it a softer sound, it followed δ, σ, and τ, as in δμώη, ἄσθμα, τμῆσις; but in different syllables it doth not refuse to usher in its sister labials b and p, as in ambulo, and amplus; also itself and n, in mamma, and damnum, but in no other: For in order to avoid the company of the rest, it prevails with its neighbour n to be its substitute, as in anceps, anfractus, anhelo, anquiro, ansanctus (but this is likewise written amsanctus) which are all compounded of the inseparable preposition am: but the preposition circum for the most part keeps its m before all letters, though in some few words n is sometimes used indifferently for it, as in circundo, or circumdo; and sometimes loseth it, as in circueo, circuitio, which however it may equally retain. Before it its sister semivowels l and r, its cognates, soften the sound. But m is not behindhand in office with its neighbour n, willingly taking its place before the labials b, p, and m, as in imbellis, impius, immodestus; combibo, compleo, commendo; and also in the Greek tongue, as in ἐμβάλλω, ἐμμένω, ἐμπίπτω, and anciently likewise in divers words, as where we see in the Sigean Psephism written in honour of Antiochus, τὴμ βασιλείαν, τῶμ πραγμάτων, τὴμ μὲν ἱέρειαν. Also before t, d, and q, as in tantum for tam tum, quendam for quemdam, quenquam for quemquam. M too in Latin words is put for the Greek ν, as in musam for μοῦσαν, organum for ὄργανον, &c. But in Latin accusatives of the third declension, which answers to the fifth of the Greek, m is often a formative only, as in patrem, and matrem, from πατέρα, μητέρα. It is likewise servile in forming tenses of Latin verbs, as in notabam, notarem, from notare: Though this servility perhaps might be the reason why the ancients pronounced this letter very obscurely, especially before a vowel, as in optimu'st, and factu'st. Cato writ die' hanc for diem hanc; and probably when not cut off by the poets, who then used it short, as for example in Cujus non hederæ circumière caput, Propert. this letter was not fully pronounced. M in numerals denotes one thousand, from the first letter of mille according to Priscian, but with more probability from its ancient mark CIƆ, which by the negligence or ignorance of transcribers being drawn together and made ⅭⅠↃ, the half of which, D, from hence stands for five hundred. N n Roman, N n Italick; both which, as all the other letters, are frequently uſed in moſt of the modern languages of Europe; eſpecially in ſuch as deſcend from the Latin. The Engliſh indeed, beſides theſe, have a black character ſomewhat like the German, in which this letter is thus expreſſed, 𝔑 𝔫; but of no great antiquity, and ſeldom uſed but in printing ſtatutes and proclamations; for our Saxon anceſtors uſed a letter very little differing from the Roman. The Hebrew tongue hath a double form of this letter, the one initial and medial נ, the other final ן, which might be the cauſe of calling it נון, which is expreſſive of both forms; in analogy to מם, which probably was ſo called from the ſame cauſe. Indeed there is a great ſhow of reaſon why it ſhould be called נון from the ſignification of the word, which is a child, as being the undoubted daughter of the mother מ. The Greeks, in taking theſe two letters from them, ſeem to have had regard to both theſe reaſons, diſcarding the finals in both, as having no occaſion for them in their tongue; and yet, to ſhow their near relation, gave them an articulation, calling the latter Νῦ, as they did the former Μῦ. Nor are theſe two liquids nearer in name, than they are in their figure, ſound, and mutual offices, in Greek and Latin. With reſpect to their figure, they differ juſt ſo much and no more, both in the capital and ſmall form, as they do in their ſound; M m being a fuller ſound, and having one line more than N n in the ſmaller ſound, without any other difference. Their nearneſs in ſound is more remarkable becauſe made by diſtinct organs, the former being a labial, the latter a dental; which is cauſed by their equally touching the palate. Nor is their reciprocal uſe in languages leſs obvious: the plural termination ים in Hebrew, in the Chaldee dialect is ין; as on the contrary, the terminations ον and ων in Greek, are um in Latin; as ὠὸν, ovum; κοινὸν, cœnum; βραχίων, brachium: αν and ην, the terminations of the accuſ. ſing. of the ſecond declenſion of the Greeks, am in the firſt declenſion of the Latins: as μοῦσαν, σχολὴν, muſam, ſcholam. In Latin derivatives from the Greek, as ν is ſometimes changed into m, as in νέω, meo; ſo on the contrary μ into n, as in μειδέω, nideo: and as before the firſt rank of the mutes, and their ſiſter labial m, n is changed into m for the better ſound, as in imbellis, impius, immodicus; ſo on the contrary, in the ſecond and third order, m is converted into n before c, q, d, t; as in anceps, nunquis, quendam, tantum: which alſo is done before f and h, as in anfractus, anhelus. The change of this letter into her other ſiſter liquids l and r, before another l and r, as in illudo, irrideo, is common, as being only made for the better ſound in pure Latin words; but the ſame is alſo done in Latin derivatives from the Greek tongue, as in ne from μὴ, lympha from νύμφη (whence our Maſter Priſcian accounts for the uſe of the Latin numeral L, inſtead of N the Greek numeral for 50. The moſt ancient Greeks, ſaith he, uſed L for N, which we ſtill herein retain) in mora, from μονὴ, in criſſo, from κνίζω. As γ, before κ, γ, χ, is in Greek ſounded like n, ſo in Latin words derived from ſuch, n is ſubſtituted for γ; as ancora, angelus, Anchiſes, for ἄγκυρα, ἄγγελος, Ἀγχίσης, though the more ancient Latins, in particular Accius, as Varro acquaints us, retained g, writing aggelus, aggens, agguilla, iggerunt; and this not only in derivatives from Greek, but perhaps in ſome of their own words. In many Latin words from Greek families, n is inſerted, eſpecially before mutes of the ſecond and third order, as in mingo, lingo, jungo, ſcando, frango, from μιγῶ, λιχῶ, ζυγῶ, σκαδῶ, ϝραγῶ, the ſecond future tenſe of μιγέω, λειχέω, ζεύγω, σχάζω, ῥήσσω, which epenthetical cuſtom is worthy to be noted, as by means thereof from verbs barytones the Latins naturalized many Greek words. But this inſerted n diſappears often in their derivatives, as in micturio, ligurio, jugum, conjux, fractus, fragilis; as alſo before gn, as ignarus, ignavus, cognoſco, and others. Beſides the letters already mentioned, n admits after it ſ, ſ and x (a compound of ſ and the ſecond order of the mutes) as annus, anſa, anxius; and in compoſition j and v, as conjicio, convivo. In writing ſome Latin proper names, where ns concur either in the middle or end of words, the Greeks, to ſoften the ſound, leave out n, as Ὁρτήσιος, Κλήμης, Πούδης, for Hortenſius, Clemens, Pudens. This letter is often omitted by the Latins, when they enfranchiſe Greek words ending in ων; as Leo, Draco, for Λέων, Δράκων: but contrariwiſe, to Latin words ending in o, the Greeks add ν, writing Κάτων, Νέρων, for Cato, Nero. In ſome inſcriptions of the middle age, and tranſcripts of that time from elder originals, we find this letter inſerted in the long ſyllables of many words; as [illegible], [illegible], elephans: which perhaps may have happened through the ignorance of the tranſcribers, miſtaking a mark ſet over ſuch ſyllables by ſome of the ancient writers only to ſhow their quantity, for the letter n. I ſhould have thought they might have affected to put this letter in the direct caſe of ſuch words, becauſe they found it in the oblique caſes, had not ſuch words as formonſus and thenſaurus checked that opinion. O, o, immediately derived from the original Greek of the same form, in which form it continues in most of the languages of Europe, at least in all which confess a Greek, or Latin, descent, is the fourth vowel, and fourteenth letter in the Latin and English alphabets, and had a double sound, both short and long, which, if we had not been told so by Quint. Inst. I, 13, is evident in itself. For it could not be otherwise before the invention of ω, several ages after the days of Cadmus; which indeed is not a different letter from ο, but the same, with the connotation of a different quantity, or double time, and that also often not observed by the Greek poets; or perhaps, doubled, as its small figure ω seems to evince; and its sound, which differs very little from that of ου, which most anciently was sometimes expressed by a simple o, as Fabius tells us, and we are further assured from the Βατραχομυομαχία and Delian inscriptions: in the former whereof we meet ΦΑΝΟΔΙΚΟ ΕΙΜΙ ΤΟ ΗΕΡΜΟΚΡΑΤΟΣ, &c. for Φανοδίκου εἰμὶ τοῦ Ἑρμοκράτους, and in the latter, latter, ΤΟ ΑΥΤΟ ΛΙΘΟ ΑΝΔΡΙΑΣ, for τῦ αὐτῦ λίθου. And the name of ο itself was originally ου, as Quintilian intimates. What I have said of this fourth vowel may be likewise affirmed of the second ε, which had also two sounds before the invention of η; at which time, as ο had both the sound and name of ου, ε seems to have had the sound, and sometimes the name of ει, for anciently they writ and read ΤΕΙ ΑΓΑΘΕΙ ΤΥΧΕΙ for τῇ ἀγαθῇ τύχῃ, as the more modern Greeks writ; wherein, and in the like words, they however subscribed the exterminated ι. Indeed this increase of the number of vowels seems rather introduced from an affectation of novelty, than any real necessity; seeing the Latins, who took a great part of their language from them, never imitated, and indeed never found any occasion for such an innovation. But the Greeks rested not here, for they invented also six supernumerary consonants ζ, ξ, ψ, and φ, χ, θ, all which are rather abbreviatures than real letters; the three former being only a connecting of the three orders of the mutes and the letter σ; the three latter a connecting the same orders and the letter H. Thus ζ connects the third order with σ, ξ the second order; and ψ the first. In like manner, θ includes H in the filter mutes of the third order; χ includes the same in the mutes of the second; and φ doth the same in the first order: and all these were writ in the first Greek alphabet with two distinct letters. For the letter h held the same place in the Greek alphabet as it doth now in the Latin and ours, at the time when these letters, or, more properly, compendious ways of writing, were invented. And here we may observe, that of all these eight new letters, as the Greeks pleased to call them, the Latins only espoused two x and χ, the former whereof they seldom used, as indeed having no occasion for it, the latter chiefly in Greek words, and servile uses; so unnecessary they accounted these innovations. This I judged proper in this place to observe once for all, to show the perfection of the Cadmean alphabet; and now proceed to a further dissertation on the letter O. The Greeks, as they framed theirs wholly from the Hebrew alphabet, so undoubtedly had this letter from the Hebrew ע, to which it answers both in the order of the letters and numerals, which in both is seventy. How ο by the Greeks came to be adopted for this Hebrew guttural, was sagaciously found out, and judiciously accounted for, by the learned Dr. Littleton; who observes, that the Greeks took their three doubtful vowels α, ι, υ, from the Hebrew ו, י, א, to which three consonants they assigned the parts of vowels, by the help whereof they read before the invention of points; for א reading a; for י, e and i; for ו, o and u. Now the Greeks observing that the Hebrews had given their first guttural א a vocal power, not knowing how better to transplant them, gave the same power to the three remaining gutturals, making ε from ה he; η from ח cheth, Chald. hetha; and ο from ע, which, as we said above, was first sounded ου, but afterwards, that ο might be upon a level with ε, to which as having a double sound they had given a double character, to the long sound of ο they assigned likewise a double figure Ω, which from its largeness in respect to the ο they called Ω μέγα, or the great ο, and consequently the primitive ο began to be called ο μικρὸν, or the little o. As to the form of ο, this account may be given: its mother ע signifies either an eye or a fountain, which this figure in some sort represents; the former with its corner, the latter with its stream. The Greeks neglecting the adjuncts, drew the eye or fountain orbicular, to express the round form of the mouth in making the sound. This vowel is changed into every other vowel, and every vowel into it; as from ἄροτρον aratrum, so from sportum sporta: as from γόνυ genu, so from pendo pondus; as from κόνις cinis, so from ὄπισθε post; as from alo alumnus, so from νὺξ nox. This vowel was not in use among some nations of Italy, as Pliny informs us, namely the Tuscans, and more ancient Umbrians, and therefore u was substituted for it. And indeed the ancient Roman writers sometimes do the same, as Acheruntе, bubus, frundescere, &c. Luc. On the contrary, others used o more frequently for u, writing advorsus, quom, servom, voltis, volnus, &c. for adversus, quum, &c. O is also used by the ancients for au, as codex, colix, plodo, plostrum, for caudex, caulis, &c. A.

P, p, Roman, P, p, Italick, 𝔓, 𝔭, English black letter, but of no great antiquity, nor in fact use, the Roman and Italick character having prevailed not only with us, but generally through Europe. The figure of this, as of all the Roman letters, was originally the same with the Grecian, as Pliny informs us, wherein he is confirmed by ancient monuments. And indeed it is still but very little different, which may be seen, as in the rest, but more particularly in this letter, P being only Γ with the transverse and depending line drawn semicircular. The Greek Γ indeed itself differs no more, scarcely so much, from its original the Hebrew final ף when turned towards the right. The name of this letter is the same in English, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, פה pe, signifying in that tongue a mouth, which the figure somewhat represents. Its place is the fifteenth letter in the English and Roman alphabets, and the first in the fifth order of the mutes, wherein is a frequent permutation because of their nearness in sound and use; for p is only a softer b, as b is a harder p. The ancient Latins writ Burrhus for the Greek Πυῤῥὸς, and in their own language sometimes were at a stand whether to write b or p; as for instance in Fabius; whether obtineo, or optineo; since more of this than that was heard in pronunciation. This is also proportionably demonstrated in their very figure, P being a half B. Yea, that they have actually changed b into p in many words for this reason only, will be evident in declining verbs ending in bo and bor, of the third conjugation, as in nubo, scribo, labor, wherein the harder sound b, when a consonant is to follow, is changed into the softer p; and this not only in declining such words, but the p from b remains also in their participles, verbal nouns, and derivatives; as from scribo comes scriptus, scriptura, scriptio, scriptito, &c. Their near affinity, in the learned languages especially, leads us into the derivation of words wherein they are found. Thus we deduce the etymology of pario, and precor, from the Hebrew ברא and ברך; thus the Latin took palpebra and pubes, from the Greek βλέφαρον and βεζῶν, and vice versâ; and ab and sub from ἀπὸ and ὑπὸ. This their proximity in nature, sound, and use, is excellently denoted in the Greek and Latin figures, Γ and P, representing one half of B. Nor is p changed only into b its middle sound, but also into its aspirate φ, especially in declining verbs and nouns, as is plain in λείβω, λείπσω, λέλειφα, where we find β before a vowel changed into π before a consonant (as was before observed in Latin verbs of the same termination) and π again into φ. So in κατῆλιψ, ιφος, ιφι, &c. gryps, gryphis, i, &c. and on the contrary φ in etymologies is converted into p, as Περσεφόνη, Proserpina. To this first order of the mutes belong f and v, into which p is also changed, as πήγω, figo; πείθω, fido; pilus, filum; and as from λεπὶς comes levis, so on the contrary from ovis is derived opilio. Nor doth p refuse the intercourse of her sisters of the second order. Hence lepus makes λαγὼς, lupus, λύκος; nor of q, which belongs to the same order. For from ἵππος, Æol. ἴκκος, comes equus: πότε, Ion. κότε, quoties; πῆ, Ion. κῆ, qua. The correspondence of this mute with the sisterhood of the third rank is visible in σπουδὴ, studium; πέραν, trans; as on the contrary in appeto, applico, &c. for adpeto, adplico. Some kindred between p and the liquids is also averred by etymologists, but, in my opinion, is precarious, as being too far removed to be depended upon. In pure Latin words this mute only precedes l and r, as in plaga, promo: but in Greek words, or of Greek extraction, it goes before h, n, s, t, as in phasma, philus, phanaticus; dyspnœa; psephisma, psilæ; Ptolemæus, and diptoton. Here also it may be proper to note, that when the Latins enfranchise a Greek word in which pt begins a syllable, they leave out either the former or the latter, writing cubo, perna, tussis, for κύπτω, πτέρνα, πτύσις. In the middle of words, p admits before it three of the liquids, namely, l, m, r; as in culpa, campus, carpo. It likewise admits n, but always by her proxy m, as in compleo, compono, for conpleo, conpono. In derivatives from the Greek the intial p is sometimes omitted, as in latus from πλάτυς, in uro from πυρῶ; which seems however to appear again in comburo for compuro. This letter appears also sometimes to be inserted in certain Latin words derived from the Greek, to hinder the collision of two vowels, as in lapis from λαᾶς, in dapes from δαὶς.
